Get your kids excited about learning with fun phonetic challenges that teach and inspire them at the same time. Start with 7 fun phonetic activities that help your kids learn to read. 1 Who knew that learning phonetics could be a lot of fun? Turn old magazines and catalogs into phonetics activities that further develop your child's understanding. Choose a letter and detect everything in the catalog that has the same phonetic sound. Grab the scissors and cut these items from the pages. Together you will make a personalized quick card as you learn the lyrics and their sound. Children will have the visual of the word, like the crocodile, along with the letter you're studying. You just need a few household items to get started. 2 Touch your creative mind when you deliver them a camera and send them on a phonetics adventure. Help them detect objects that navigate them from A to Z through photos. They can take pictures of everything from an anthill to a Zamboni. The lesson continues at home when your child makes their own alphabet book with their pictures. The activity never gets older and can be used to capture a field trip, vacation or regular day with mom or dad through your eyes. 3 Help them practice writing skills as you type words for them phonetically. Once they know the phonetic sounds of the alphabet (aah, buh, cuh, etc.), they will be able to write and understand all those words they see in their storybooks. Get a notebook and help them create lists that cover everything from their toys games they like to play. It sounds every letter so they can write the word themselves. For example, if they like cars, they sound cuh for them to type the letter C, then aah for the letter A and so on. 4 Burn some of your child's endless power supply. Reproduce phonetic activities that teach them letters, letters and The Alphabet Ball is a multifaceted game that grows with them and can be adapted to suit a variety of school themes. There are three levels of play: one for young children, one for schoolchildren and one for schoolchildren. To start all you need are a ball, a marker and a kid who loves to play. 5 Print free worksheets from your computer to work with them on each letter and their sound. This is one of the most basic phonetic activities your child can do and is easy to start with. As you become more confident with the lyrics, this phonetic activity will give you a mini-break because they can sit nearby while you're working, kitchen dinner, or folding laundry. Since you will be reaching out from an arm away, you can periodically ask questions about the letter while working on something else. 6 Dig right into the phonetics books to give them a head start in understanding reading. Many phonetic programs include books that are written specifically for initial readers. Sit a little one by one to deal with the sounds of letters and words in sight. They will feel a sense of pride and success as they flip the pages and learn to read each word. They will become eager to get their hands on even more books, which is a habit that will foster a lifelong love of reading. 7 They can learn even when you don't feel like playing phonetic activities right along with them. Your noggin can still get a workout with some of the first phonetic DVDs available on the market today. Watch the programs with them and talk about them later to test their memory memory. Engaging in a conversation about what they saw helps reinforce what they saw and includes in phonetics activity, even though their DVD player helped lend a hand in the teaching department.
